EDITOR'S NOTE

The piece begins with a thought about hedging against the depreciation of the rupee and gradually extends that idea to a different kind of "hedging"; what happens when people begin to hedge their futures by building them elsewhere. It reflects on brain drain through observations from student life at SRCC, particularly the recurring aspiration to pursue education and careers abroad, and considers the implications of this movement of human capital.

Today I saw a headline about how the rupee is depreciating, and one of my first chain of thoughts was maybe I can just hedge via investing in gold, USD-based investments, etc? But then something stuck in my head: what if people start hedging their future too? Maybe some of them already are.....

Lately I've been noticing something at SRCC.

I have talked to quite a few people here. Some of the brightest, ambitious people I have come across in my life. And there is this one answer that keeps resurfacing whenever conversation eventually reaches the future:

"Plan toh abroad ka hai."

Not everyone, but enough that I started paying attention.

It makes me wonder: What happens when some of the brightest talent of the country starts imagining its future somewhere else? That's brain drain. (I'll only focus on one side of the coin here.) Once you have experienced a place with more opportunities, infrastructure, exposure, networks, or simply a different lifestyle? "Coming back to where I started" isn't automatically the default anymore. And it doesn't even mean ki "India is bad, therefore everyone leaves." It can be much simpler, something like "I tried something bigger, liked it, and now my opportunity cost to return is enormous."

EXPRESSION GAZETTE

Capital can flow in and out, but human capital is different. And to be very honest? I can't even sit here and pretend ki I am somehow above this. Who says I won't? To me, the feeling is already understood on a much smaller scale. I grew up in Agra. Then I came to Delhi for college. And after experiencing Delhi? I don't particularly want to go back to Agra. Not because Agra suddenly became a terrible place. It didn't. I simply experienced something different: more opportunities, more people, more things happening around me, more possibilities. Now scale that up? Agra -> Delhi. Delhi -> another country. After spending years abroad, building a career, friends, becoming independent, getting used to a different environment... Is returning really as simple as saying, "come back to India"? Maybe for some people, yes. But for others? Maybe not. And that's the uncomfortable part. The very people who leave may be the people India most wants to retain.

A currency can lose value and gain it back, but when a person leaves, learns, builds, anp decides that is where they belong... You don't get that human capital back quite easily, if ever.
